Members of Faculty, for First Circle Organized at Home of Mrs. A. J. Drexel Biddle to Work With General Committee

For the first time in 35 years holders of yearly appointments on the faculty of the University of Pennsylvania know that their services are desired for the next year, and that the period of "watchful waiting" which heretofore extended into the summer and provoked protests during the strife over the dismissal of Scott Nearing last June has been eliminated by the trustees.

This is the first spring in the memory of the oldest faculty members that they have been informed of the action the trustees had taken on their incumbency. The new method of giving ample notice of the disposition of appointments is one of the advantages gained by the teaching staff in the course of the trouble which followed the Nearing dismissal.

Nearing was not notified he was dismissed until June 17, a time, as it was then asserted, when most of the universities and colleges throughout the country had already filed vacancies for the next year, and the chance of getting engagements was slight.

This year, however, the appointments of assistant professors and instructors were affirmed, and on April 1 the 430 members of the faculty whose tenure was one year were notified of the action and the size of the salary at which they would be retained.

The University faculty has expressed satisfaction with the early notification sent them from the office of Provost Smith, Harrison S. Morris, administrator of the estate of John Wharton, founder of the Wharton School, and one of the supporters of Scott Nearing, declared today, however, that the assistant professors and instructors were "getting only their rights" in being informed about their positions at this time.

"If the notifications were not sent," said Mr. Morris, "the University would not be living up to its word. This is an outcome of the Nearing case. Early notification of appointments was one of the objects of the fight that followed Scott Nearing's dismissal. It is just and right that the University faculty should know what is in store for the next year in time to make other provision if necessary."

The resolution specifying April 1 as the date for informing the teaching staff of the trustees' action was part of a general amendment rearranging the tenure and method of appointing the staff made at a meeting of the trustees on December 30, and the outcome, according to Nearing adherents, of the agitation that followed his dismissal.

Dean Rowell C. McCrea, of the Wharton School, said he believed the Nearing case had been one of the contributing causes of the trustees' action.

"The Nearing matter did focus attention on some of the rather easy-going methods of the University," he said. "This is a great improvement. It has happened that a man did not know whether he was to be retained until just before the opening of the fall semester, and some times later. Engagements at other colleges are usually filled in March and April. The field is virtually closed for June."

Provost Edgar F. Smith, of the University, said the spring notification was a gain he favored for several years. He did not see any connection between the new method and the Nearing case.
